

The Death Penalty in Harris County

- Harris County prosecutors have secured death sentences for 298 people since 1974, more than any other county.
- In the 1990s, Harris County juries routinely sent as many as 15 people to death row each year.
- While Harris County remains the top sentencing county in Texas, jurors there have imposed just three new death sentences since 2019. Most recently, a jury sentenced Robert Solis to death in October 2022. He represented himself at trial and did not call any witnesses during the punishment phase.
- There are 64 people on death row who were convicted in Harris County; this constitutes more than one-third of Texas's current death row population.
- 21 of the last 22 defendants sentenced to death in Harris County are people of color (16 are Black, four are Hispanic, and one identifies with another non-white race/ethnicity).
- In the 1990s, the Harris County District Attorney's Office was three times more likely to seek the death penalty against Black defendants than similarly situated white defendants.
- Harris County accounts for 135 executions since 1982, more than any state in the country except Texas and twice as many as any other county. Two individuals convicted in Harris County were executed this year.
- Since 2019, 34 individuals have been removed from death row due to sentence reductions, overturned convictions, or deaths in custody; one-third of those cases came from Harris County.
- Of the 18 death row exonerees in Texas, five were convicted in Harris County. In 2019, Alfred Dewayne Brown was declared "actually innocent" of the crime for which he spent a decade on death row. Prosecutors had withheld important phone records that corroborated his alibi. He was released in 2015 after charges against him were dropped.
- According to the Houston Area Survey for 2020, conducted by the Kinder Institute for Urban Research at Rice University, only 20 percent of Houstonians think the death penalty, rather than life imprisonment, is the most appropriate punishment for murder.
